Violoncello e Pianoforte

Notes for the performers

This piece is based on a polymetric system very much like that from Southern India. Each instrument follows its own independent metrics and tempo, coming only together with the other instruments at specific 'heaviness points'. These synchronization points are indicated by the full barlines, which are the only ones to have real metrical value; the dashed barlines are there merely to facilitate playing together and have no metrical meaning at all. Instead, the metrics within each instrument are indicated by the ^ accents, marking the beginning of a new 'bar' for the specific instrument. These 'bars' are moving as independent metrical phrases from and towards the different synchronization points as indicated by the size of the notes: when the notes are getting smaller they are moving away from the metrical 'heaviness point', when they are getting bigger, they are growing towards the next metrical 'heaviness point'.

In short: 'bars' are indicated by ^ and move as independent metrical phrases towards common 'heaviness points', indicated by full barlines; the dashed barlines are there only to facilitate playing together and have no metrical value at all.

Specifications

Ilachýam can be played in two different versions. The first is as an installation of 4 solo pieces (preferably in open air, as the piece is based on the sounds of wind, water, land and fire), where the musicians are placed on hearing distance from each other (the sound preferably being carried by the wind); the 4 musicians repeat independently their part as a solo piece during the duration of the installation, and the audience walks freely in between them, carried by the sound. The second is as a traditional concert quartet piece on stage.
